TASK 1

Monday: We left the house around 8:00 on the morning of Christmas Eve. Dad was pretty uptight because he wanted to leave an hour earlier, but mom said he was being ridiculous and we'd get to the airport in plenty of time. It turns out Dad was right. We should have left earlier. Apparently, Christmas Eve is one of the busiest travel days of the year, so the roads were choked with families driving to see their relatives. What made things a lot worse was when it started to snow. After that, things slowed to a crawl. When we reached the airport, the main parking lot was full. That meant we had to park in the economy lot, which was pretty far away. When we got to the gate for the economy lot, Dad couldn't reach the ticket from his window, so he made me get out of the car to grab it. Unfortunately, I didn't notice that there was a giant slush puddle on my side of the car until I stepped in it. After we parked, we rolled our bags to the nearest shuttle stop, which wasn't a lot of fun. The sign said the shuttle bus to the main terminal came every 10 minutes. But there was no room for us in the bus shelter, so we had to wait outside in the freezing cold. Twenty minutes went by without a bus and dad started getting really anxious about the time. He said we were just gonna have to walk to the terminal, which was about a mile away. I would have tried to convince dad to wait a little longer, but my sock was starting to turn to ice and I didn't wanna get frostbite.

Example 0

My first part-time job was at a bakery, and this is in New Zealand and about... I was in high school then, so about two times a week, in the weekend like Fridays after school, and Saturdays all day, I would go to the bakery and sell the bread to the customers.

Speaker 1

My first part-time job was working at McDonald's. When I was fifteen, I had a job at McDonald's flipping burgers, doing fries, cooking, not taking orders. I enjoyed it for a while, about two or three months, but then I started losing interest in it, and after six months, I quit the job, but it was a good job for a fifteen-year-old.

Speaker 2

My first part-time job was at a restaurant called Chucky Cheese. It's a famous restaurant in America that is for little kids and sometimes I was a waiter but sometimes I got to dress up as Chucky. Chucky is a big mouse. He's the character for Chucky Cheese, and so I... I would go around entertaining little kids.

Speaker 3

My first part-time job was washing dishes in a restaurant. It wasn't a very glamorous job, but I really wanted it because I wanted to pay for horse-riding lessons, so every Saturday night I went to this restaurant and worked for maybe five hours every night.

Speaker 4

My first part-time job was as a cashier at a supermarket. I really hated it, cause I had to stand on my feet for basically eight hours a day dealing with a lot of people who don't appreciate the job that we do, so I had a lot of people yelling at me for different reasons and always misunderstanding the situations. It's not a job I would go back to.

Speaker 5

I was living in a small town, Tulsa, Oklahoma, and I worked for the Harmon Foundation, and they owned a hands-on science and math museum for children, so every day I would run a laser light show, and once I was through with that I would give museum tours and explain the science and math background to each exhibit. It was a lot of fun seeing kids open their eyes to mathematics and science and wanting to know more and asking questions that I couldn't answer.

TASK 4

Traditional timetables are pretty unrealistic and difficult to stick to.

So, here's my top 5 tips for creating an effective study timetable.

Starting off with tip number one. So, you've got a blank week in front of you. Add in the stuff you'll enjoy. If you've got a favorite TV show you have to watch every Thursday, or football practice, then the first thing to do is plan this time in. Why do this first? Well, it is good to have things to look forward to. If we're happy, we're motivated. So don't give up everything you enjoy when it comes to exam season. Doing things we enjoy is a really great way to control our stress. This also includes the time you'll be at school or work. We're now left with the available revision and work time.

Number two. Focus on tasks, not time. In traditional timetables, we only block out time slots for a subject. So we'll say, ten to eleven we'll revise maths. At the end of that hour we stop, no matter where we are, whether we've completed a task or not. Focusing on tasks rather than time allows us to be more in control of what we are learning. After all, an exam tests what you know, not how long you spent learning.

Following on from this, number three is specific. Make specific goals for each study task. For example, complete question number one from practice paper five for maths. Study goals boost our confidence in our ability, as we can clearly see our achievements and progress.

Next up is time. When you've got your specific study task, estimate how long roughly this will take you to do. Then block the tasks into the schedule in short sharp sessions, along with breaks. Long study sessions don't work. Use the technique of 25 minutes with five-minute breaks in between and use these breaks to stretch your legs or play with your dog. It doesn't matter if a task will take you two sessions, because working in this way will improve your memory of new information.

The reason most timetables don't stick around for very long is because the second they don't work, we give up on them completely. Which leads me to my last tip: be flexible. At the end of the day, take a minute to reflect on what worked well and what did not. Change your plans if necessary. Move things around, work out your optimum time of day to be studying. Being flexible allows us to continually progress and personalize our study routine to fit us.
